JOHN WILLIAMS GUNNISON (1812-1853), THE LAST OF THE WESTERN EXPLORERS, by Nolie Mumey (Denver, 1955. 500 copies signed. p. 189, map, illus. $10.00). Brandon has written a book that is scholarly, objective, detailed and dramatic. His fine choice of words, sensitive appreciation and poetic handling of a blundering tragedy raises the book far above the average historical writing. The author is much more gifted and competent than the man he is writing about. Fremont's stature is not increased by the book, but the men who worked, and sometimes died, to make Jessie Benton's husband a hero stand out as rugged, resourceful and very human individuals. New sources of information have been tapped. Careful research and an intimate knowledge of the terrain covered by the Fourth Expedition places Brandon in a position to write a moving narrative that is detailed and forthright. It is honest. The work will be pleasing to both the Fremont admirer and the critical analyst. It is a great book of interpretation of one phase in the life of an opportunistic gone sour.

DON M.

Another book about the great path-minder John Charles Fremont is apt to be redundant and boring, but not so is William Brandon's The Men and the Mountain; Fremont's Fourth Expedition (William Morrow & Co., N.Y., 1955, 337 pp., biblio., index, $5.00). Brandon has written a book that is scholarly, objective, detailed and dramatic. His fine choice of words, sensitive appreciation and poetic handling of a blundering tragedy raises the book far above the average historical writing. The author is much more gifted and competent than the man he is writing about. Fremont's stature is not increased by the book, but the men who worked, and sometimes died, to make Jessie Benton's husband a hero stand out as rugged, resourceful and very human individuals. New sources of information have been tapped. Careful research and an intimate knowledge of the terrain covered by the Fourth Expedition places Brandon in a position to write a moving narrative that is detailed and forthright. It is honest. The work will be pleasing to both the Fremont admirer and the critical analyst. It is a great book of interpretation of one phase in the life of an opportunistic gone sour.

DON M.

Here is the yarn spun by Bill Roberts, the man who claims to be Billy the Kid. Fans of the Kid will ever be indebted to Morrison for having painstakingly gathered the surviving court records and locating some never-before-published pictures. They may, however, quickly lose interest in the story itself, for Roberts never makes it seem even remotely possible that he could have been the Kid. Here are none of the insights or new information that we would expect from an actual participant, nor is there a balanced presentation of the evidence. Thus, the reader is told that Roberts left Silver City in 1872, he is not informed that the Kid arrived there in 1873 and left in 1875. He is advised in a footnote that there is a story in Silver City that the Kid's name was McCarty; he will find nothing in the book to indicate that this is thoroughly documented by contemporary legal records and newspaper items—not is there anything in Robert's tale to account for this name. He is given Robert's account of the Lincoln battle; he is not warned that practically all of it is directly contradicted by the sworn testimony at the Dudley Court of Inquiry—including that of the Kid himself. Morrison shows that there is no proper legal record of the death of the Kid, but Roberts conspicuously fails to show that the Kid was not killed. More's the pity; if he had been even a little convincing it would have made for better reading. -PHIL R.

JOHN WILLIAMS GUNNISON (1812-1853), THE LAST OF THE WESTERN EXPLORERS, by Nolie Mumey (Denver, 1955. 500 copies signed. pp. 189, map, illus. $10.00).

John Williams Gunnison was born Nov. 11, 1812 in Goshen, Sullivan County, New Hampshire. His American ancestry went back to Hugh Gunnison who settled in New Hampshire in 1631. John entered West Point in 1833 and, despite serious eye trouble which necessitated leave of absence, he graduated with honor in 1837, second in a class of fifty.

He was commissioned a second lieutenant, saw service in Florida against the Seminoles and in the Cherokee Indian Nation. He made surveys of Lake Michigan and other northwestern lakes. In 1849 he accompanied the Stansbury expedition, his duties to survey a new route from Ft. Hall to the Mormon settlement in Utah Territory.

Gunnison's place in history, however, results from his own expedition of 1853, the year of his death. As captain, he was ordered by Jefferson Davis, Secretary of War, to survey a route from the Mississippi to the Pacific for a proposed transcontinental railroad. His command made its start near Westport, southeast of Ft. Leavenworth, proceeded to and up the Arkansas River past Bent's Fort, up the Apishapa River, across to the Huerfano River, up the San Luis Valley and across Cochetopa Pass. Then down the Gunnison to the Colorado, across and down stream a ways, then West across the Wasatch Mountains to the Sevier River. On Oct. 26th Captain Gunnison, taking a small detachment up river, was ambushed by Indian arrows and rifle fire which killed him and his detachment with the exception of four men who managed to escape.

Dr. Mumey's book is much the most complete account of Gunnison. There is his usual careful research brought together in a readable, beautifully printed volume.

It is regrettable perhaps that Dr. Mumey's books are published only in very limited editions, restricting readers to a very small group. This is especially true of this latest book of his; a book of great value to the western historian and student and a high spot of western literature for 1955.

-merrelk.
The West Isn't Dead

After drifting with Westerners from many corral's and looking over the stock that carries the Steerhead brand it becomes evident that the West is of the West. It has just entered a different period of activity. The modern Westerner is as aggressive and colorful as any Old Timer. He just travels a wider range and rides a different horse. All Westerners are not with the Steerhead outfit, but all ride herd on the same material. Some riders are top hands with clear eyes, quiet and deadly sincere; others are brushing-busters who fill themselves with mental hickory withe around their necks, and have two cubs that year, to feed on mutton, veal and buck, it even contains the Gettysburg Address.

The fight grew warm and then hot. Into a melee fourteen times before I killed her, the bank fell, out, yet our county commissioners want me to kill wolves for $1 or $2 a head and run the risk a thousand dollars for old wolves and one dollar for cubs (50% discount for cash) while other states paid five, ten and even fifteen dollars. Corbin counted it a "poor day if I don't average four to seven," and the wanted the bounty raised.

"At Long Lake Creek I shot an old wolf fifteen times before I killed her. The bank fell in behind me, and it would have killed me all I could do to dig out, yet our county commissioners want me to kill wolves for $1 or $2 a head and run the risk of being eaten alive. If they read my book through, they will change their tune."

Supported by stockmen, Corbin campaigned to make wolf killing profitable. In 1899 North Dakota contained 266,000 sheep and 543,000 wolves. "Paying bounty on old wolves, and shut off the wolf supply factory," he urged. The problem was serious; 171,000 female wolves would each produce six or seven cubs that year, to fatten, and every veal and poultry at the farmer's expense.

Corbin, sixty-five years old, colorful and armed with a grievance, wrote and spoke to editors, county commissioners and even addressed the state legislature. He met opposition. The fight grew warm and then hot. Into a melee of curses, shrieks and threats of law suits he fired his musket, and issued his book, "Corbin's Advice," as a cannon load of scrap iron. The most fabulous hodgepodge of frontier reminiscences, wolflore, newspaper excerpts, jokes, yarns of an authentic and worthwhile record of a serious frontier problem; the costly depredations of the wolf and its Spanish flintlocks drew attention from far places and, down to modern times, miqueleus have been the choice of Spanish provincial government and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The miqueleus flintlock remained a favorite in Spain, Spanish America, Africa, Arabia, Russia and even Scotland till 1893, when the Flint- and-steel firearms were outnumbered by the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Cali­fornia Catalan volunteers armed with pichubs, trabucos and carabinus de miqueleus defended frontier settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribal enemies.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier in the United States-Mexican War, and issued in the holy cause of making a fast buck, it even contains the Gettysburg Address. But, it was sold. After 55 years it still stands as an authentic and worthwhile record of a serious frontier problem; the costly depredations of the parasitic and uncured varmints. cont'd. page 4

New Members

Dwight L. Clarke—A second generation Californian, native of Berkeley, California with a long established and widely known hobby of California history and bibliography. Profession­ally he has been a banker, starting in San Francisco, followed by 16 years of banking in Bakersfield. In 1932, he moved to Los Angeles and has lived and worked here since that time.

Carroll Friswell—Although he is now a native of South Dakota, Carroll Friswell was born in North Dakota and his greatest Western interests lie in the period shortly after the end of the Civil War with the appearance of the Western Gunmen—Marshall and Buffalo Bill. Another facet of interest is the Northern Plains Indian and his conflict with the white man. Mr. Friswell is an established and well-known bookseller, a member of the Hesperian Society and a member of the American Historical Association.

Donald Boelter—Don needs no introduction to you. He has been a corresponding member for many years, and is the son of our ex-sheriff, Homer H. Boelter, and a nephew of Gordon Boelter. Don is married and is raising a family. He is a native Californian, but his deepest interests are founded in the early history of the Dakotas, Montana, and Idaho.

Outlaw Words cont'd. from page 5

riots, or outbreaks, of Miqueleus of Pratts were familiarly known as Miqueleus, the diminutive plural of Miquel. The French equivalent of that diminutive was Miqueleus; the English is Mike or Mique.

The reputation of Miquel de Prats' guerrillas and their Spanish flintlocks drew attention from far places and, down to modern times, miqueleus have been the choice of Spanish provincial government and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The miqueleus flintlock remained a favorite in Spain, Spanish America, Africa, Arabia, Russia and even Scotland till 1893, when the Flint- and-steel firearms were outnumbered by the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the California Catalan volunteers armed with pichubs, trabucos and carabinus de miqueleus defended frontier settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribal enemies.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier in the United States-Mexican War, and issued in the holy cause of making a fast buck, it even contains the Gettysburg Address. But, it was sold. After 55 years it still stands as an authentic and worthwhile record of a serious frontier problem; the costly depredations of the parasitic and uncured varmints. cont'd. page 4

From the Santa Fe Daily New Mexican, January 7, 1883—When a cowboy goes into a western newspaper office to demand satisfaction, the editor always explains that the assistant editor who wrote the story "has just gone out to kill a man, but will be back in a few minutes."

The cowboy never waits.

The first white woman to enter what is now our Southwest was Cäcilia de Amaya, wife of Miguel Sanchez Valenciano, a member of Antonio Espejo's expedition of 1582-83.

In search of personal correspondence of Hayden as well as his diaries, Westerners are asked to supply sources of information that Dr. Fryxell has not yet explored.

Ed Carpenter, who wrote the story of Idaho Mescham Strube, this issue of the BI, is a member of the Huntington Library, and is in search of personal correspondence of Hayden as well as his diaries. Westerners are asked to supply sources of information that Dr. Fryxell has not yet explored.

No wonder the N.Y. Corral is active. Peter Decker thereof offers a book for sale that was printed four years before the incidents described took place.

William Marion Speer of our Corral has been awarded a medal of honor for forty years active service in the American Red Cross. The medal was personally presented by President Eisenhower. Only five such medals have ever been awarded. The American Historical Association and the Western Trails Museum, long at Huntington Beach, has been purchased by Knott's Berry Farm and will be housed in a special building under an agreement. Marion will be director, and will have a full time curator to help him conduct the museum.
Westerners from all over the Los Angeles range bunched at the Mona Lisa Restaurant early on May 19 to greet old friends and meet others who were but names on the Tally Sheet. It was the first annual rodeo of the Los Angeles Corral. Fifty-eight waddles were on hand. Range talk was fast and stimulating, for top hands in Western art, literature, history and experience were there with their windies.

Lawrence Clark Powell who rides herd on the books and bookkeepers at the U.C.L.A. library was the dinner speaker. He expressed himself on "Writers of the Southwest." The Southwest, he said, using Ed Ainsworth's definition, is where the mesquite grows, but Larry added that he had seen mesquite growing in the Kew Gardens of London, England, so the range is pretty wide. Particularly, he confided his territory to Arizona, New Mexico and round about.

Walter Gann did a fine job. It was a real Westerners meeting.

The imaginative talk was given by Dr. Andrew Rolle of Occidental College on "The Life and Times of William Heath Davis," at the Mona Lisa roundup on April 21. Davis was not a great many, but was a mirror of his time. He lived and observed during the great days of hide and tallow in California, and left a readable account of his life. Dr. Rolle deftly placed his subject in a large picture of affairs rather than making him a minor hero. He brought Davis very much alive and the speaker brought them to the present.

Westerners Win. D. McVay of Cleveland, Ohio has sent the Bi a copy of the 75th Anniversary Edition of the Tombstone Epitaph, dated May 5, 1953. Twenty-four pages of "news" clipped from past issues of the Epitaph and Projector give the short coverage of the Earp-Clanton fracas, bravus, earthquakes, Apache troubles, etc. A great issue of a paper, and an item for any Westerners library.

There's a new Corral in Tucson, Arizona. Clay Locket, 72 West Broadway, Tucson is Sheriff.

Several years ago a movie poked some fun at THE OLD WEST was mentioned. There is also a group of archeologists who think of the desert with a capital D. The best-known literary representative of this view is Mary Austin, but apparently she did not care to convey the feeling of the Desert was Idaho Meacham Strobridge, born just a century ago.

Humboldt, Nevada, at the turn of the century was not the place one would look for a center of arts and crafts or literature, but there, in the attic of a ranch house, was the Artemisia Bindery, a non-commercial shop in which Mrs. Strobridge, after the tasks of running the house and the ranch and a nearby gold mine, did bookbinding and other handicrafts and wrote short stories which she sent off to The Land of Sunshine in Los Angeles. Charles F. Lummis, her editor, was proud of this contributor, and wrote an article about her early life and her work in his issue of January, 1901.

She came of a California pioneer background. Her father, George Washington Meacham, had been in California in the '50s—he is said to have built the first Protestant church in California—there was a great issue of a paper and an item for any Westerners library.
The West is vast and has many facets. Minor but important episodes and persons have left their enduring stamp on Western history. These exploits and personalities are scattered through the volumes that fill the shelves of many Westerners. They become more important when drawn together into a design that illumines some part of the larger mosaic. Edward S. Wallace has done a good round-up job in The Great Reconnaissance (Little Brown & Co., Boston, 1955, 289 pp., $5.95). Wallace shows how the nation was carved out before the outbreak of the Civil War. Bartlett, Emory, Fremont, Carvalho, Whipple, Mollhausen, Hardy, Ives, Derby, Martz, Heap, Beal, and many others pass in review. —Don M.

OUTLAW WORDS

by Bob Robertson

The Old West, which might be more accurately termed the Young West, was in the popular mind, a place teeming with outlaws, outlaw men, horses, cattle and other wild beings who broke the frontier's rules. No matter how fancy the word, those early law breakers have come words and names which, with changed meanings, are part of our American language.

An example is cattle rustling, which, in English, has come to be a name for the big-horned, wild sheep of our western mountains, had its beginning in the West Indies and South America during the Spanish Conquest. Some of the "blackbirds" sold to traders by slave hunters were of wild African tribes that did not submit docilely to captivity and forced labor. These blacks broke away at every chance and took to the tall hills (ciimog), where they hid and lived, the wild free life of their jungle ancestors.

English slavers called these outlaw Africans bush niggers, and Spanish slavers named them cimarrones for their habit of lurking among the wilderness cimor or hilltops. The English word cimarron (a castaway) is a contraction of cimarron negro (black outlaw), and in Spanish usage, the female animals are called cimarronas, feminine gender of cimarron. A better variety of yebra mate, the plant which furnished the traditional beverage of the gaucho, is likewise known by the name of cimarron.

In modern English, the term cimarron has come to be applied to feral animals of domestic breeds. Such words as bronco, bronca, negrito, ladina and ladina and others better serve to describe the untamed range of range and range.

Mexicans and their neighbors of adjoining countries designate as cimarrones the wild species of animals and plants which have domestic counterparts. The wild cousin of tame sheep, goats, pigs, turkeys, geese and ducks are the borrego cimarron (bighorn sheep), chivo cimarron (Rocky Mountain goat), ceche cimarron (pecary), guanaco or ciego cimarron (wild turkey) and ganado cimarron (wild goose) and pato cimarron (wild duck). Wilderness relatives of common plants of garden and orchard, too, are named for their habit or behavior. For example, the wild cinnamon or cimarron is a weed little loved by stockmen whose range it trespasses.

The backwoods seem to have been a favorable environment for the spawning of outlaw elements and from the wilds of the Pyrenees, Mountains came another outlaw word which today is little known except among historians, students and collectors of ancient firearms. That she used a deformed version of the French word of the same spelling but different pronunciation, French miquelet was derived from Catalan miquel, which varied in time and place. Here is a brief discussion in the form of miquelets, miquelito and miquelita.

In modern English, miquelet is applied to Spanish military and provincial guardsmen, and among firearms antiquarians, to a gun of early Spanish Flintlock design.

Long before the coinage of the name miquelet, the Pyrenees had been the arena of smuggling, battle and international intrigues in which the mountaineers developed a professional proficiency. Although classed and treated as criminals by the authorities of the French and Spanish governments, the mountaineers considered themselves and their professions respectable, if not quite legal, and they became organized to the point of being a guild. A chart or map would show that French and Spanish had not been satisfied with any but the best. Not for them the matchlock arms with glowing, smoking slow matches to betray them nor were they the cumbersome, complicated wheel locks suited to the operations of the Contra-bandistas.

It is certain that Spanish craftsmen were among the first to make successful guns employing the flint-and-steel principle and there is some evidence that they might have devised the system. It is equally certain that the Pyrenean miquelet was early in the sixteenth century. It is uncertain whether or not the so-called snap-buckle or Spanish lock of the later sixteenth century was a Spanish invention but it is a certainty that the so-called miquelet was designed in Spain early in the seventeenth century.

The new lock of Spanish pattern was efficient and suited to light, effective firearms that immediately became popular and in great demand among the mountain clans. Pistas were handy tools of offense and defense; carbabinos (carabines) were short and easy to carry; fusiles (rifles) were effective at long range and escopetas (muskets) and bajonets or trabado nañeros (blunderbusses) were efficient scatter guns for night operations.

In the latter part of the seventeenth century, one of the periodical wars between France and Spain was in progress and the well-armed mountain men were noxious. Miquel and Caralda banded together under the leadership of one Miquel de Prats, an able Catala guerrilla-fighter. Miquel is the Catalan name for French Michel, Spanish Miguel and the English Michael, and the war... century more. In her later years she failed to keep up the necessary repairs on her house, and is said to have expressed the wish that it would fall down before her death.

It is by the books she bound, those she published, and those she wrote—often overlapping categories—that Mrs. Strobridge is apt to be known to present-day book collectors and those interested in the West. Her sketches of desert life, mostly concerned with the Black Rock area in northern Nevada, portray an awe and love of the desert, but are realistic in their approach, and do not gloss over the hardships of desert life, particularly for a woman. The stories are to be found in files of The Land of Sunshine and other periodicals and in the three books which Mrs. Strobridge published herself after settling in Los Angeles: In Miner's Mirage Land (1904), The Loses of the Desert (1905), and The Land of Purple Shadows (1909). These books were issued in printed wrappers in editions of one thousand. Copies could be had in three-quarter or full leather from the author's bindery. In the full leather copies the chapter-head vignettes were hand colored. Each book was signed on the limitation page, as will be seen, copies bound by her were signed in a colophon, and copies when occur with presentation inscriptions, so a single copy may be much autographed. A feature of Mrs. Strobridge's books which adds interest for those on his land, and the wolves moved in to start producing cubs for a money crop.

An interesting feature of the copy of Corbin's Advice is an engraving of Judge Freeland, of Corydon, Iowa. Corbin pasted an address label on the front cover, placed a stamp partly on the label and partly on the cover and dropped the book through a window into a sack. The stamp is canceled on the front cover. The round post office mark, "Glencoe, North Dakota," still legible.

We cannot say here whether the legislature ever followed Corbin's Advice. This man who encouraged wolves to breed for a dollar a head would have prospered if he paid him five. Unless there is a record somewhere of a vast wolf business around 1901, the legislature must have voted against him.

The West is vast and has many facets. Minor but important episodes and persons have left their enduring stamp on Western history. These exploits and personalities are scattered through the volumes that fill the shelves of many Westerners. They become more important when drawn together into a design that illuminates some part of the larger mosaic. Edward S. Wallace has done a good round-up job in The Great Reconnaissance (Little Brown & Co., Boston, 1955, 288 pp., illus., biblio., index, $5.00). Wallace has done an excellent job of piecing together the outline of a story which he prefab by saying, "This is an informal story of the men who explored, surveyed, and mapped our new boundary with Mexico in the latitude of 1848, and through the leadership of one Miquel de Prats, an able Catala guerrilla fighter. Miquel is the Catala name for French Michel, Spanich Miguel and the English Michael, and the war..."
Hashing over the evening's activities at the Westerners first annual rodeo on May 19 are, from left, range hands W. W. Robinson, Loring Campbell, Glen Dawson, Ward Ritchie, Edwin Corle and Larry Powell.

_CORRAL CHIPS

Westerners from all over the Los Angeles range bunched at the Mona Lisa Restaurant early on the evening of May 19 to greet old friends and meet others who were but names on the Tally Sheet. It was the first annual rodeo of the Los Angeles Corral. Fifty-eight waddies were on hand. Range talk was fast and stimulating, for top hands in Western art, literature, history and experience were there with their windies.

Lawrence Clark Powell, who resides here on the books and bookkeepers at the U.C.L.A. library, was the dinner speaker. He expressed himself on "Writers of the Southwest." The Southwest, he said, using Ed Ainsworth's definition, is where the mesaquis grows, but Larry added that he had seen mesaquis growing in the Kew Gardens of London, England, so the range is pretty wide. Particularly, he confided his territory to Arizona, New Mexico and round about.

The writers he discussed were not the historians, archeologists and explorers but the men and women who have created a world-wide concept of the Southwest through their artistry and fidelity of spirit. Mary Austin, Zane Gray, Harvey Fergusson and Willa Cather were cited as examples. The real literature of the land is measured by its influence on people, and not able account of his life. Dr. Rolle deftly placed his subject in a large picture of affairs rather than making him a minor hero. The days of Davis were very much alive and the speaker brought them to the present.

The warmest talk was given by Dr. Andrew Rolle of Occidental College on "The Life and Times of William Heath Davis," at the Mona Lisa round-up on April 21. Davis was not a great man, but was a mirror of his time. He lived and observed during the great days of hide and tallow in California, and left a readable account of his life. Dr. Rolle deftly placed his subject in a large picture of affairs rather than making him a minor hero. The days of Davis were very much alive and the speaker brought them to the present.

Westerner Win. D. McVay of Cleveland, Ohio, has sent the Bill a copy of the 75th Anniversary Edition of the Tombstone Epitaph dated May 5, 1955. Twenty-four pages of "news" clipped from past issues of the Epitaph and Projector give the spot coverage of the Earp-Clinton fracas, braves, earthquakes, Apache troubles, etc. A great issue of a paper, and an item for any Westerners library.

There's a new Corral in Tucson, Arizona. Clay Lockert, 72 West Broadway, Tucson is Sheriff.

A SAGEBRUSH WESTERNER

_Idah Meacham Strobridge, 1855-1932_

by Edwin H. Carpenter, Jr.

Several years ago a movie poked some fun at the men who always took off their hats when The Old West was mentioned. There is also a group of aficionados who think of the desert with a capital D. The best-known literary representative of this view is Mary Austin, but apparently the men in the attic of a ranch house, was the Artemisia Bindery, a non-commercial shop in which Mrs. Strobridge, after the tasks of running the house and the ranch and a nearby gold mine, did bookbinding and other handicrafts and wrote short stories which she sent off to The Land of Sunshine in Los Angeles. Charles F. Lummis, its editor, was proud of this contributor, and wrote an article about her frontier bindery and her work in his issue of January, 1901.

She came of a California pioneer background. Her father, George Washington Meacham, had been in California in the '50s—he is said to have built the first Protestant church in California in Nevada in the '50s, and later in California again, living in both Oakland and Los Angeles. He married Phoebe Craiger, and their daughter, who was born in the Mormon Valley on June 9, 1855, later combined her father's first name and her mother's maiden name to form a pseudonym, George W. Craiger.

Idah Meacham attended Mills Seminary in Oakland, and in 1884 married Samuel H. Strobridge. Three sons were born to the couple, but all died in infancy, and their father died after only four years of married life; thus during the most active part of her career Mrs. Strobridge was a childless widow.

When she first appeared on the scene as an active writer she was in Nevada, as has been mentioned, but soon she moved to Los Angeles. Perhaps Lummis would not have written so enthusiastically about her if he had known that shortly she would build a house three or four blocks from his and engage in a rivalry to capture visiting "lions." The house Mrs. Strobridge built on the edge of the Arroyo Seco—at 233 East Avenue 41—still stands, though it has been cut up into apartments. It is U-shaped, with a huge sycamore in the courtyard, and had a screened-in corridor and rooms for the bindery, which continued to be called the Artemisia Bindery. The whole establishment was known as "The Sign of the Sagebrush." Pictures of the house and some of the rooms will be found in the advertising matter at the back of Mrs. Strobridge's books.

At one time she also had a shop called "The Wickup" in San Pedro, located in an old butterhouse.

Living in the house on the Arroyo until her death in 1932, Idah Meacham Strobridge carried on multiple activities. She wrote, published, and bound her own books, did other publishing and binding, was an elocutionist, and was an active genealogist; there are still in Los Angeles genealogists who received their training from her. She was a member of several social, genealogical, and literary organizations. Those who knew her in her later years describe her as rather small, round-faced, and active. She was not at all interested in elaborate dress, perhaps even verging on the dowdy, but she did object to showing her age in a photograph, and did not allow any to be taken after she was about fifty. The smaller picture here reproduced was taken about 1905, and is apparently her last photograph, though she lived a quarter of a

A NOTE ON SOURCES: (Charles F. Lummis: "A Sage-Brush Oasis," The Land of Sunshine, January, 1901, pp. 28-52; E. M. Kemper: "Idah Meacham," Portrait of the West, ed. by Frank Luther Mott and Alain Locke, Norton, 1942, Vol. 1, p. 218; Franklin Walker: A Literary History of Southern California (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1950), pp. 204-205; obituary of George W. Meacham, Los Angeles Times, December 20, 1914; and interviews with Ralph Moccio, artist, and Ella Tate, genealogist and librarian of the Sons of the American Revolution, Los Angeles. The half-tone block of the smaller photograph was kindly lent by Mrs. Tate; the larger photograph was used to illustrate Lummis' article, the inscribed copy reproduced being in the writer's possession.)
THE BRANDING IRON
OF THE LOS ANGELES CORRAL OF THE WESTERNERS
Published Quarterly in March, June, September and December
OFFICERS - 1955
LORING CAMPBELL, Sheriff
232 South 6th St., Burbank, Calif.
JAMES F. GABRELS, Deputy Sheriff
1492 Ramos Pl., Pacific Palisades, Calif.
DAN GANN, Register of Marks & Brands
GLYN DAWSON, Ass't. Register
141 Anita Drive, Pasadena 2, Calif.
HENRY S. CLIFFORD, Rep. Representative
619 South Spring St., Los Angeles 11, Calif.
HOMER H. BOELTER, Deputy Sheriff
in Charge of Branding
828 North La Brea, Hollywood 30, Calif.
BRENT H. OLSON, Keeper of the Jit
610 North Reseda Dr., Beverly Hills, Calif.
LONNIE HILL, Deguerreroo Wrangler
DAN BRYANT,
DON MEADOWS, opr. wrangler
GORDON BOELTER, in Charge of Branding
LONNIE HULL, Deguerreroo Wrangler
DAN BRYANT, opr. wrangler
PHIL LOOMIS, opr. wrangler
Gavin Dawson, opr. wrangler

Address Material for Publication to
The Roundup Foreman
Don Meadows
640 Tandia Avenue, Long Beach 14, Calif.
CHARLES N. RIDDICK, Ass't. Roundup Foreman
1490 Lornin Rd., San Marino 9, Calif.

CORBIN'S ADVICE
by Cyrus B. Condra

"I am a hunter by birth, a veritable nimrod from away back..." wrote Ben Corbin, Boss Wolf Hunter of the Dakotas, in the preface to his Corbin's Advice, or Killer, starting in San Francisco, published by Bismarck, Dakota, 1900.

Unfortunately the state paid only ten dollars for old wolves and one dollar for cubs (50% discount for cash) while other states paid five, ten and even fifteen dollars. Corbin counted it "a poor day if I don't average four to seven," and the wanted bounties raised.

"At Long Lake Creek I shot an old wolf fifteen times before I killed her. The buck fell in behind me, and when I could do no more I cut out, yet our county commissioners want me to kill wolves for $1 or $2 a head and run the risk of being eaten alive. If they read my book through, they will change their tune."

Supported by stockmen, Corbin campaigned to make wolf killing profitable. In 1890 North Dakota contained 266,000 sheep and 543,000 cattle. It was the goal of Spanish provincial government and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The wolf cull was a patriotic duty, to win and retain international respect. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

The reputation of Miquel de Prats' guerrillas was spread to Europe through reports by Spanish explorers and by their Spanish finfooters. Their wolf population was not a concern, but were of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eaters ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Mexico, the wolf population was not a concern, but was of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eaters ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

Outlaw Words cont'd. from page 5

New Members...

Dwight L. Clark--a second generation Californian, native of Berkeley, California, with a long established and widely known hobby of California history and bibliography. Professionally he has been a banker, starting in San Francisco, by 1896, followed by ten years of banking in Bakersfield. In 1932, he moved to Los Angeles and has lived and worked here since that time.

Valery Friswold--although he is now a native Californian, the former Valery Friswold of North Dakota and his greatest Western interests lie in the period shortly after the end of the Civil War with the appearance of the Westerner; 1865-1868. Another facet of interest is the Northern Plains Indian and his conflict with the white man. Mr. Friswold is an established and well-known businessman and has practiced law.

Donald Boelter--Don needs no introduction to you. He has been a corresponding member for many years, and is the son of our ex-sheriff, Homer H. Boelter, and a nephew of Gordon Boelter. Don is married and is raising a family. He is a native Californian, but his deepest interests are found in the early history of the Dakota, Montana, and Idaho.

Outlaw Words cont'd. from page 5

riots, or outlaws, of Miquel de Prats soon were familiarly known as Miqueletes, the diminutive plural of Miquel. The French equivalent of that diminutive was Miquelet; the English is Mike or Miquelet.

The reputation of Miquel de Prats' guerrillas and their Spanish finfooters drew attention from far places and, down to modern times, miqueletes have been an embarrassment to Spanish power and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

No wonder the N.Y.Corrals are active. Peter Decker thereof offers a book for sale that was printed four years before the incidents described took place.

Western Marion Speer of our Corral has been awarded a medal of honor for forty years active service in the American Red Cross. The medal was personally presented by President Eisenhower. Only five such medals have ever been awarded to Western Trails Museum, long at Huntington Beach, has been purchased by Knott's Berry Farm and will be housed in a special building now under construction. Marion will be director, and will have a full time curator to help him conduct the museum.

From the Santa Fe Daily New Mexican, January 7, 1883—When a cowboy goes into a western newspaper office to demand satisfaction, the editor usually explains that the assistant editor who wrote the story "has just gone out to kill a man, but will be back in a few minutes."

The cowboy never waits.

The first white woman to enter what is now the Southwest was Castilla de Amaya, wife of Miguel Sanchez Valenciano, a member of Antonio Espejo's expedition of 1582-83. Before that time the Western Indians numbered only twenty months old. A fourth child was on the way when the family started on its long journey homeward from the Zuni Indian country. What a woman!...

F.W.H.

The new Kansas City Posse of the Westerners has broken loose with an active membership and a well defined program. A big meeting was held at the old Grintner House, built in 1857 on the site of the first Kaw River Ferry, on the evening of June 14. Alan W. Ferris spoke on the Delaware Indians in Kansas. Frank Glenn is the Sheriff.

Dr. E. M. Fryxell, 1313 42nd Ave., Rock Island, Illinois, is engaged in preparing a biography of Ferdinand V. Hayden, organizer and director of the first U.S. Geological Survey of the Territories. Dr. Fryxel is in search of personal correspondence of Hayden as well as his diaries. Westerners are asked to suggest sources of information that Dr. Fryxel has not yet explored.

Ed Carpenter, who wrote the story of Miquel de Prats of this issue of the BI, is a staff member of the Huntington Library, and is at present on leave working in the New York Public Library on a biography and bibliography of Noah Webster. (Yeh, Noah wrote more than the dictionary.) June 9 of this year was the centennial of Hayden's birth, and we do well in recognizing a true Westerner.

No wonder the N.Y.Corrals are active. Peter Decker thereof offers a book for sale that was printed four years before the incidents described took place.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.

The name Trabuco, attached to a mountain, a canyon and a creek in Southern California, commemorates the loss of a musketoon by a soldier of Spanish provenance and national guard leaders in the selection of militiamen and irregular soldiers. The mule-eater ships were outfitted with the percussion inventions of the Scottish clergyman, Reverend Alexander Forsyth.

In Nueva Espana (Mexico) and the Californias, the wolf was a pest of Spanish settlements and missions against Comanche, Apache, Yaqui and other tribes.
John Charles Fremont is apt to be redundant and boring, but not so is William Brandon's The Men and the Mountain; Fremont's Fourth Expedition (William Morrow & Co., N.Y., 1955, 357 pp., biblio., index, $5.00). Brandon has written a book that is scholarly, objective, detailed and dramatic. His fine choice of words, sensitive appreciation and poetic handling of a blundering tragedy raises the book far above the average historical writing. The author is much more gifted and competent than the man he is writing about. Fremont's stature is not increased by the book, but the men who worked, and sometimes died, to make Jessie Benton's husband a hero stand out as rugged, resourceful and very human individuals. New sources of information have been tapped. Careful research and an intimate knowledge of the terrain covered by the Fourth Expedition places Brandon in a position to write a moving narrative that is detailed and forthright. It is honest. The work will be pleasing to both the Fremont admirer and the critical analyst. It is a great book of interpretation of one phase in the life of an opportunistic gone sour. —DON M.

Another book about the great path-minder John Charles Fremont is apt to be redundant and boring, but not so is William Brandon's The Men and the Mountain; Fremont's Fourth Expedition (William Morrow & Co., N.Y., 1955, 357 pp., biblio., index, $5.00). Brandon has written a book that is scholarly, objective, detailed and dramatic. His fine choice of words, sensitive appreciation and poetic handling of a blundering tragedy raises the book far above the average historical writing. The author is much more gifted and competent than the man he is writing about. Fremont's stature is not increased by the book, but the men who worked, and sometimes died, to make Jessie Benton's husband a hero stand out as rugged, resourceful and very human individuals. New sources of information have been tapped. Careful research and an intimate knowledge of the terrain covered by the Fourth Expedition places Brandon in a position to write a moving narrative that is detailed and forthright. It is honest. The work will be pleasing to both the Fremont admirer and the critical analyst. It is a great book of interpretation of one phase in the life of an opportunistic gone sour. —DON M.

Out Carson City way, on the Nevada sand flats, Westerner Bob Roberton has a trading post and a vast amount of cowboy lore stored up in his cranium. Only a small bit of his information is printed in this issue of the B1.

the Mississippi to the Pacific for a proposed transcontinental railroad. His command made its start near Westport, southeast of Ft. Leavenworth, proceeded to and up the Arkansas River past Bent's Fort, up the Apishpa River, across to the Huerfano River, up the San Luis Valley and across Cochopapa Pass. Then down the Gunnison to the Colorado, across and down stream a ways, then West across the Wasatch Mountains to the Sevier River. On Oct. 26th Captain Gunnison, taking a small detachment up river, was ambushed by Indian arrows and rifle fire which killed him and his detachment with the exception of four men who managed to escape.

Dr. Mumey's book is much the most complete account of Gunnison. There is his usual careful research brought together in a readable, beautifully printed volume.

It is regrettable perhaps that Dr. Mumey's books are published only in very limited editions, restricting readers to a very small group. This is especially true of this latest book of his; a book of great value to the western historian and student and a high spot of western literature for 1955. —MERRIEL K.